Who does not love the hour of twilight grey. Ere night, descending, mantles o'er the earth, With darkness which absorbs the light of day, As parch'd ground drinks in rain after dearth!

Tis then that all men love to sit and muse; The old o'er days gone by and pleasures past; The young, o'er dreams which fate cannot refuse,

They find to be but airy castles vain, But, in their fall, bring only grief and pain

'Tis then the poet wanders forth in dreams, Through forest glades, and over mountains
